Khanna argues that the world is entering a new phase of globalization, which he calls "globalization 2.0." This new phase is characterized by the rise of the South, which is home to the majority of the world's population and is growing rapidly. The South is also becoming increasingly integrated into the global economy, and its economies are growing faster than those in the North.

At the same time, the North is facing a number of challenges, including slow growth, aging populations, and rising inequality. These challenges are making it difficult for the North to compete with the South, and they are leading to a decline in the North's share of the global economy.

Khanna argues that the second great divergence is not inevitable. He believes that the North can still avoid decline if it takes steps to address its challenges. However, he also warns that the North is running out of time. The South is rising rapidly, and if the North does not act soon, it will be too late.

Rise of the South is a must-read for anyone who wants to understand the future of the global economy. Khanna's insights are clear and thought-provoking, and he provides a roadmap for how the North can avoid decline and embrace the opportunities of globalization 2.0.
