For centuries, the frontier was the dividing line between the settled East and the unsettled West. It was a place where anything was possible, and where fortunes could be made or lost.

The frontier was first explored by European settlers in the 16th century. These early explorers were looking for a Northwest Passage to Asia, but they instead found a vast and unknown continent.

In the 17th and 18th centuries, settlers from the East began to move into the frontier. They were looking for land, for gold, and for a new life. As they moved westward, they encountered native peoples who had lived on the land for centuries.

The relationship between settlers and native peoples was often strained. There were wars and massacres, but there were also periods of peace and cooperation.

In the 19th century, the United States government began to acquire land from native peoples through treaties and wars. The government also encouraged settlers to move west by offering them land grants and other incentives.

As settlers moved into the frontier, they brought with them their own culture and values. They built towns and farms, and they established schools and churches.

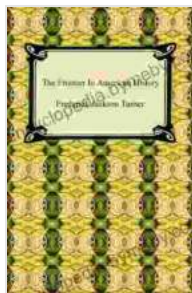

The frontier also attracted outlaws and criminals. These men and women preyed on settlers and made the frontier a dangerous place to live.

In the late 19th century, the frontier was declared closed. This meant that there was no longer any unsettled land in the United States.

The closing of the frontier marked the end of an era in American history. It was a time of great change and upheaval, but it was also a time of opportunity and progress.

The frontier is a central part of the American story. It is a place where dreams were made and broken, and where the character of the nation was forged.
